There, the poet sees banyan tree. The memory of the banyan tree in his own garden rushes to him. And now that the tree in reality is dead, for his father brought it down, the poet carries its memories in his faded dreams. The poet personifies the banyan tree by saying that this tree is the one that grows in one's dreams, i.e., in poet's dreams.

Acacia - I don't know what a Banyan tree looks like, but this poem reminds me of an old man, a Rastafarian or a griot with shaggy locks and bent limbs, a man who attracts children because he can let them be. He does not expect them to change for him. He accepts them as they are. So, they come to him. They surround him, and they dream.
