Compared to The Mysteries of Udolpho, The Romance of the Forest has fewer explained ghosts but the few it has are employ well and to great effect. One aspect of the story I found very interesting was how Radcliffe handled Adeline's romantic interests. Some have described Adeline has cold because she resists from trusting others, and particularly the men who love her, but I found her resistance perfectly reasonable consider how she was deprived of a loving family and betrayed the few friends ...

Ann Radcliffe, in The Romance of the Forest, reshapes Burke's notions of the sublime as a masculine experience. To do this, she utilizes the features he discusses that help invoke the sublime, but reshapes their purpose. Radcliffe empowers her heroine, Adeline, by allowing her to indulge in an experience that was previously stereotyped as male. Radcliffe creates a more democratic sublime, in ...
